Sectional Spamming Is Back: It's No Longer Effective Spamming is a great business tool. We're used to it. We've become quite accustomed to being overwhelmed with spam. Spam has been a big piece of my email marketing history. I've seen it all. Only a few years back, I was dealing with so much spam it was some days I had no idea what was going on in the email channel. I'd have mass email campaigns that would go out, spam like we're all used to. Spam gets your brand in front of people. It can be effective. But you don't just throw a mass spam campaign out there and not expect some kind of a response. The days of that are gone. And that's the thing. I'm noticing more and more spam that looks like real email. If you're familiar with Nexia's Anti-Abuse Technology, you know that sectional spamming wasn't effective. If you sent out a spam campaign that had a sectional spam trigger, you stood a better chance of getting caught, because the chances of the one specific spammer being caught were likely one in a thousand. But you don't need to have a technical limitation with spam. I'm seeing more and more that it looks like a real person is writing the email. The sections aren't as clearly defined. Spammers aren't giving it much effort.
